

Bronson memory brings pain after seeing 'awful event'

By The Dallas Morning News, WFO

After filming the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, Charles L. Bronson was moved to write the following letter to his seven sisters:

Memory is a most blessed and wonderful thing, but when a world-shaking tragedy of such national and international significance and importance has been indelibly stamped deep within the recesses of the mind by seeing with the eyes that horrible event, then memory haunts you incessantly and robs you of peaceful sleep.

Frances (Mrs. Bronson) and I were eyewitnesses to that untimely and awful event from a distance of 50 or 60 yards.

That morning at breakfast, I told her of my plan that would see the fulfillment of a dream harbored since boyhood — getting to see the president of the United States and his first lady, walking and smiling.

The newspaper Thursday had given a detailed map of the parade route and the timing of events from the moment the president landed until he was to depart. The parade was to take place during the noon hour and there reason had to take Alice (a daughter) church in Oak Cliff to meet a party who were motoring to Bethany. Okla. I asked her to meet me at the Union Station parking lot at about 12:10 p.m. I left work about five minutes before the noon hour and in about 15 minutes I met Frances and we parked the cars and walked about four blocks to that little park area at the foot of Elm Main and Commerce streets.

If you will recall, Houston Street intersects Elm, Main and Commerce and also runs parallel to the railroad tracks. Two triangles are formed by the three streets with Houston Street at the base of the triangles and the triple railroad underpass marking the apex of the two triangles. Some colonnades at a basement or abutment on either side are across the head of the triangular park area which slope down towards the triple underpass. On either side of Main Street in the park area are three stone abutments, the highest of which is four and a half or five feet high and two feet by five feet in area on top.

We chose the one on the left (as viewed from those in the parade) as it not only afforded us a full view of Main Street down which the parade was to come, but we could watch it make the right turn on Houston Street over to Elm and left on Elm Street down to the underpass. For some reason there were less than a dozen people from the colonnade area on Elm Street down to the underpass which really gave us an unobstructed view of that point.

I suppose that the reason for the scarcity of people at that particular place in the parade route was that for one thing you would be downhill and couldn't see any part of the procession until it was right in front of you and the other reason was that this spot was just beyond the main downtown area where thousands upon thousands were jammed. So this area marked the end of the parade. And, indeed, "the end of the parade" took on a double meaning at this point.

Frances tore one of her hair ribbons off her top but it was worth it. She said she was going to save it as a souvenir of that day in history.

There was another couple that we shared this vantage point with as we had plenty of room and an unobstructed view.

We only had 10 or 15 minutes to wait until they were to arrive and I took one shot with my Leica and then used my movie camera as they approached and made the turn on Houston Street. Frances had been viewing through the binoculars and as the parade got to the corner she wanted me to take the binoculars so I could get a good view of Jackie in her bright pink suit highlighted by a brilliant Texas sun. But I told her to keep watching through the binoculars while I took the pictures. I don't know how many I took with my Leica, three, four or at most, five.

But I was taking one with my Leica as they were about halfway down to the underpass . . . and then it happened! My first impression was parade — celebration — fireworks when I heard the first two shots ring out in rapid succession and a slight pause before the third shot rang out. My next thought was that the Secret Service men had no doubt fired at someone who was about to cause real trouble. I murmured to Frances, "Is that fireworks or is some one shooting?"

At I said, I was looking through the viewfinder all the time the parade was en route so I couldn't see any details. But right after my remark, Frances said, "President Kennedy is bent over and Jackie has her arm around him and Governor Connally is lying down."

Then I looked and saw a few people lying flat on the ground just as the presidential car stopped for a split second and then take off. I told Frances, "Let's get out of here before we get caught in some confusion." And we did. We heard someone say, "Oh, President Kennedy is shot."

As we hurried to the cars we tried to believe that if it really were gunshot that we heard that no one in the presidential car was hit. We turned on our car radio as we headed for home and the plant and it was just a matter of a few minutes that we learned that both the president and the governor were hit. But somehow it was just too unreal to believe that such a thing could happen on such a beautiful day here in our beloved city of Dallas.

Shortly after I got back to work did we learn that President Kennedy was dead and the governor was critically wounded. And what a terrible feeling came over me as I thought that just a few minutes ago I was getting to see the president of the United States and his first lady smiling and waving to cheering Dallasites crowded in the stands. Three loud shots were still echoing in my ears and you, indeed, the parade was over.

Whether we want to face facts or not, one day in our national history was ended with that first shot of deadly accuracy. Another day is dawning. Just what is it now we all want in exchange for this

Whether our political views might be as all must admit that President Kennedy was one of the world's great men. But that keen mind of his that was able to absorb so much through his eyes and ears and that mind that was so capable of generating ideas and plans and making them known by the mouth and you was in killed on an early as the flash of a candle is blown out. All because one man skilled in his art succeeded in his delectable plan of hate and grudges.

As you study the moments and the moments, you have two men at the opposite extremities of society. Both were highly successful in carrying out their plans. But the one was optimistic in what he desired in life and President Kennedy embraced the world both had served of men. But the one had heart of brass and our president's heart of flesh. And you could go on and on in pointing out their similarities and contrasts that are brought into memory view from this time.

I know you are all praying that God is His infinite wisdom, mercy and grace will see us through in these days of national and international tension.

Lots of love,
Charles
